Communicating data to drive change

By Patrick McCarthy, president and CEO, and Lisa Hamilton, vice president of external affairs, Annie E. Casey Foundation

Kids can't vote. They can't buy ads on television. They can't form a political action committee to get what they need. They can't speak up for themselves, and as a result they often disappear from the crowded list of political priorities competing for attention. To combat this invisibility, the Annie E. Casey Foundation has been building a project known as KIDS COUNT for more than a quarter century.

KIDS COUNT began in 1990 as a single product: a national data book comparing 10 indicators on children (including infant mortality, education expenditures, and the teenage employment rate) across the United States. The theory behind the book was that if we created an accurate, comprehensive picture of what children need, change would follow. With its ranking of outcomes by state, the foundation hoped to draw attention from the media, as well as from local, state, and national policymakers, by capitalizing on the human impulse to compete.

Learn how the Annie E. Casey Foundation has leveraged the power of information and communication to drive public investment in children and their families. Read more.

From project to platform: the evolution of KIDS COUNT

By the Annie E. Casey Foundation

This report tells the story of how a single data book documenting child well-being measures turned into a mission-critical vehicle for the Foundation in building bipartisan support for proven practice solutions and policy change. The report includes data and research insights that the Foundation gained from decades of investing in a program that turned into a keystone for shaping and amplifying policy on a broad scale.

Investing to close Americas racial wealth gap

By Beadsie Woo, The San Diego Union-Tribune

Like many economists who care about American families struggling to make ends meet, I spend a good amount of time thinking about how parents can earn more income to give their children better opportunities and reduce stress in their daily lives. But my real mission is one you hear less about in the debate over income inequality. For families to make their way to a better life, it's not enough to earn more. They've got to keep and grow their earnings, too.

Advice from an award-winning fundraiser

By Patrick M. Rooney, associate dean

Barbara Coury didn't get into fundraising for accolades, but she's receiving them anyway.

American Red Cross President Gail McGovern recently presented the national organization's Presidential Award for Excellence -- the highest honor a Red Cross employee or unit can receive -- to Coury, chief development officer for the Indiana Region, and her development team.

It's a well-deserved award. During the past fiscal year, Indiana was third in the nation in total dollars raised against its goal, exceeding the target by 124 percent.

What's the key to their success?

"The Red Cross has increased its emphasis on reaching out to major donors in addition to the vital support we receive from smaller gifts," Coury says. "In Indiana, we focus on engaging with individual donors and self-accountability. Each fundraiser reports weekly on several key metrics, including the number of visits with donors."

Those visits are paramount. Read more.
