What design thinking is doing for the San Francisco Opera

By David Hoyt and Robert I. Sutton, Harvard Business Review

On March 2, 2015, a line of people stretching around the block waited to get into the Rickshaw Stop on Fell Street in San Francisco. This was not like most nights at the funky music venue and bar; the people in line weren't waiting to see an indie band, or dance to music spun by a DJ. This night the entertainment would be opera ... of a sort. The evening, organized by the San Francisco Opera (SFO), was called "Barely Opera," with the slogan "This Isn't Your Grandmother's Opera." Complete with a "Wheel of Songs" that audience members could spin to select the next song, a live DJ, opera-themed drinks, and costumes for attendees to try on, it was designed to remove the intimidation often felt by those new to opera and introduce a younger, hipper audience to operatic music.

Barely Opera was the result of a project that was part of a course at Stanford University's Hasso Plattner Institute of Design ("d.school"). As part of the course, two students worked with SFO to help the Opera think about how to best use a new 299-seat facility that would open in early 2016. But they hoped that the benefits would extend far beyond this objective - that the project would introduce the Opera staff to new ways of thinking that offered the potential to fundamentally change how it operated.

Upgrading a network

By Sarah Murray, freelance reporter, Stanford Social Innovation Review

Mallika Jain, a 15-year-old girl who lives in San Jose, Calif., is on her way to raising $25,000 to pay for bathroom facilities, water purification systems, a computer lab, sports grounds, and libraries for two schools in poor communities in India. This effort to develop and display her fundraising prowess is part of a project for her Girl Scout troop. Jain, who has been an active Girl Scout since the age of 5, talks passionately about the way that scouting has helped her become a confident social change leader. "One of the main things I've gained from Girl Scouts is the ability to look beyond myself, my friends, my family, and my community – to think about the global perspective and to look at a problem and say, 'I'm going to make a difference,'" she says. "And I get so much out of this project, knowing that I was able to raise the money myself."

Being a Girl Scout has long been about more than camping under the stars and selling cookies door-to-door. But Jain's story demonstrates just how much the Girl Scout movement has changed in recent years. Founded in the early 20th century, the movement has reinvented itself for an era of girls' empowerment. Its purpose is to prepare members to become not just capable women but also effective leaders. To bring a legacy institution into the 21st century, the leaders of Girl Scouts of the USA have overhauled everything from its federated structure to its information technology systems to the way that Girl Scouts sell their fabled cookies. Flint's nonprofits response to lead contamination

By Andy Segedin, reporter, The NonProfit Times

The contaminated water crisis in Flint, Mich., has spurred the local nonprofit community into action, both tailoring programming to the new needs of the city and managing donations from across the country.

Local organizations' involvement in the crisis dates back to the fall, according to Jamie Gaskin, CEO of the United Way of Genesee County, when the local medical community confirmed significant amounts of lead in the city's tap water. Questions concerning the quality of the city's tap water dated back to the spring of 2014, according to multiple reports, when the city switched its water source from the Detroit Water and Sewerage Department (DWSD) to the Flint River.

The local United Way has stepped up its efforts in two primary ways. One, it helps fund the local access 2-1-1 phone system and call centers. The centers typically field between 100 and 200 calls per day, but have seen an uptick to 800 to 1,200 per day during the crisis. The United Way of Genesee County has also focused on capacity building, raising funds to sponsor the work of other organizations. About $1.1 million has been raised as of the end of January, according to Gaskin. Read more.

Why your nonprofit should be using nonprofit accounting software

By Jim Simpson, CPA and director, Financial Technologies & Management

As the number of nonprofits has proliferated, accounting software is more tailored and can help manage these complexities. But taking the time to select the right software for your nonprofit is critical.

Before your purchase, start with a software evaluation and assessment to see if you're a good candidate for nonprofit accounting software. The software evaluation and assessment will review your current system to determine its level or utilization and functionality. It is probably a good idea to perform a software evaluation any time there is a major change within the organization either positive or negative.

Nonprofit accounting software has several features and functionality to help your organization with some of the following:

- Flexible report writer
- Grants management capability
- Cost-allocation functionality
- Strong audit trails
- Integration with payroll, fundraising, and other applications
- Expanded capabilities as organization grows
- Various financial segment or element tracking to include funding sources, programs, projects, locations, and other essential financial information. Read more.
