Teach for America retools efforts to recruit graduates from top colleges

By Emma Brown, national education reporter, The Washington Post

Teach for America has spent most of its 25 years working to expand, growing from a concept outlined in a Princeton student's honors thesis to an education-reform juggernaut that places thousands of idealistic college graduates in some of the nation's neediest classrooms.

But that growth has stalled. Applications for TFA's two-year teaching stints have plummeted 35 percent during the past three years, forcing the organization to reexamine and reinvent how it sells itself to prospective corps members. It has been focusing particularly on how to engage students at the nation's most-selective colleges, where the decline in interest has been among the steepest.

"It's going to take us time to recover," said Elisa Villanueva Beard, TFA's chief executive, noting that the organization's leaders are trying to "step back and take a really honest look" at why TFA is struggling to attract interest and how to reverse the trend. Read more.

Former Postmates COO Peter Hazlehurst is back with his own seed-funded startup

By Connie Loizos, Silicon Valley editor, TechCrunch

In April of last year, Peter Hazlehurst made news when he left his position as COO of Postmates just seven months after joining the on-demand delivery company.

He said at the time he was looking for more responsibility and possibly to do his own startup. Now Hazlehurst - who previously spent seven years as the chief product officer of Yodlee and another two-and-a-half years as a Google executive focused on its consumer payments initiatives - has formed that startup, a crowdfunding platform for scholarships called AngelScholars.

It's an interesting outfit, one that encompasses both a nonprofit and a for-profit company that's been structured as a B Corp, which basically means it's committed to balancing its social mission and profit.

How it works: AngelScholars allows so-called angels (which can be anyone) to support students' education by creating a "scholarship" - say, to buy uniforms for a certain school, or to help defray costs for students attending summer school at New York University. As with AngelList, each person spearheading a particular campaign is responsible for drumming up the interest of others to make it successful. Read more.

Can schools be held accountable without real consequences?

By Matt Barnum, LA School Report

California is hoping to redefine school accountability in the "California Way."

While state officials are hard at work designing a system in line with the oversights demanded by the Every Student Succeeds Act (ESSA), the new federal K-12 education law, they also want to remain true to the state's ethos of de-emphasizing test scores and focusing on helping - rather than "punishing" - struggling schools.

"We have had now basically three years without a functioning accountability system and we're approaching the moment when we actually have to put something in place," said David Plank, a Stanford professor and executive director of the research group Policy Analysis for California Education (PACE).

A report released in May by a task force convened by the state superintendent lays out a series of metrics - beyond standardized test scores - for judging schools, but says little about what happens to the ones that persistently score poorly. Read more.

Sponsor's insight

Don't let outdated practices hamstring your nonprofit

By Teddie Linder, business manager, Netlink, Inc.

Recently, Netlink assisted a for-profit property-management company in its acquisition of multiple apartment complexes in another state. The client planned the acquisition and worked with us to ensure a timely takeover regarding technology. In advance of the transition, the only variable not completed involved obtaining master settings, licensing and passwords from the previous IT management resource. This info is needed to make sense of what is in place, make changes, install new software, create new accounts and connect to the new management company's network and IT resources.

Unfortunately, the property-management company's existing IT provider wouldn't address any needs in advance of the changeover.

The staff arrived to work on the first day under new management only to find their systems didn't work properly. They were unable to conduct the routine daily business like moving tenants in and out, and handling maintenance requests. The manager in charge of the transition was upset, frustrated and angry; the transition took longer and was going to be more expensive.

Even after it was resolved, a single question remains: What happened? Read more.
