How can the U.S. end homelessness?

By Alana Semuelsm, staff writer, The Atlantic

A&Q is a special series that inverts the classic Q&A, taking some of the most frequently posed solutions to pressing matters of policy and exploring their complexity.

On any given night in the United States, half a million people are homeless. Some of them sleep in shelters, others on the streets; roughly one-quarter are children.

About 15 percent are so-called chronically homeless, which means they haven't had a permanent home in years, and often cycle through jails, hospitals and homeless shelters in search of a place to lay their heads.

The government has tried to tackle the problem of homelessness on nearly every level, but comprehensive solutions have proven elusive, despite billions spent over time. The federal government has set a series of goals of ending homelessness for veterans by 2015, chronic homelessness by 2017, and homelessness for families with children and youth by 2020. But reaching these benchmarks appears to be much further off. Read more.
Second-generation collective impact

By Saphira M. Baker & Kelly King Horne for Stanford Social Innovation Review

What separates collective impact efforts that spin their wheels from those that continue to gain traction for years to come?

After working on multiple collective initiatives over the years -- including efforts to reduce poverty, improve workforce development and early childhood development systems, and end homelessness -- as well as regional collaborations, it's clear that the idea of shared management and collective commitments is attractive to those working to bring about social change. Yet managing one that has true staying power is remarkably challenging.

First incubated at the local United Way in 1998, Homeward -- a nonprofit coordinating agency targeting homelessness in Richmond, Virginia became independent in 2006, and the following year, launched a collective action plan to end homelessness in the area in 10 years' time. As a consultant to social change efforts (Saphira) and the executive director of Homeward (Kelly), we signed up to help recalibrate the initiative during its last three years, 2015-2018. The effort has many features of a collective impact approach: some 30 public and private agencies share a vision; regularly collect and interpret data; accomplish their work through a hub of work groups; and are guided by a backbone organization that has public and private funding sources, and community recognition. Working together, these agencies have contributed to an almost

A first-class solution

Review by Dennis P. Culhane, Dana and Andrew Stone Professor of Social Policy, University of Pennsylvania

Few social problems have appeared to be as intractable as contemporary homelessness. Seattle and Los Angeles each recently declared a "state of emergency" after a noticeable escalation of homelessness in the past year. In New York City, a sudden resurgence of street homelessness has prompted almost daily local headlines. Polls show the issue is back atop the public's agenda. At the same time, news accounts across the United States have heralded certain cities' and states' successes in battling homelessness. Houston, New Orleans, Philadelphia, Phoenix, Salt Lake City, and the state of Virginia, for example, each have declared that they have effectively ended homelessness among veterans.

How can we make sense of these competing narratives? Homelessness researchers Deborah Padgett, Benjamin Henwood, and Sam Tsemberis offer an answer. Their new book, Housing First, examines the reasons that the eponymous Housing First movement has succeeded dramatically in battling homelessness when traditional, top-down efforts have failed. In doing so, the book offers broader lessons about the risk that institutions built around addressing social problems may lose sight of their core missions behind the ideologies and vested interests of the professionals involved. New nonprofit career resource

By Bryan Orander, president, Charitable Advisors

Most of us have frequent career conversations. These might take the shape of a friend seeking advice, contemplating our own future, or hiring a new person to join our team. As the employment marketplace tightens, people are becoming more comfortable changing jobs and considering options and alternatives.

In the career marketplace, there are employers, job seekers, and intermediary functions like job advertising, community networking, and job seeker support groups. One of our primary roles at Charitable Advisors is to help that nonprofit career marketplace function better.

Every week, thousands of individuals explore the Charitable Advisors' Nonprofit Job board in search of career opportunities and every week, area nonprofits post 15-20 new job ads with Charitable Advisors and over 10,000 applicants for positions last year.

http://charitableadvisors.com/post-a-job/indianapolis/

Over the years, Charitable Advisors has written articles about nonprofit careers and developed short handouts for presentations. Last spring, we concluded that it was time to develop a brief, yet comprehensive, resource to support both job seekers and the community leaders whom they often reach out to for guidance. Read more.

TRENDS / RESOURCES

National news

Is your nonprofit built for sustained innovation? Research suggests that most leaders of nonprofits believe that to advance their missions, they must imagine and create new approaches to solving vexing social challenges.

Nonprofits cashing in on social advertising plugs. Imagine that there is a whole host of individuals willing to support your organization's mission, you need only find a way to reach them.

Self-care: The magic solution to combating burnout? Self-care is not a fad that is sweeping the nation, but a theory that has the ability to increase the endurance of nonprofit practitioners.

Reduced performance triggers turnover for nonprofit executives. The nonprofit sector has been criticized for not holding its executives accountable, even when they are underperforming, but a recent study found that not accurate.
