Museums tell teenagers: We're here for you

By Alina Tugend, journalist, The New York Times

Elkeyshia Webster, 11, had no interest in going to a program at the Pérez Art Museum Miami on a Saturday when she could be home, watching TV. And she was particularly angry when she found out that the event involved working with the police.

"I really didn't want to be there, but my mother made me," she said. "I haven't had a good experience with police." Elkeyshia, known as Shia, was 8 when she and her mother were going out for pizza. She said the police pulled over their car and pointed a gun at them, mistakenly believing they had been involved in a drug deal.

But Art Detectives, a new three-day program scheduled to run on consecutive Saturdays, and whose pilot version took place last year, is directed at young people just like Shia. And it is part of a growing movement across the country to create programs for preteens and teenagers that use innovative art concepts to explore challenging ideas.

A number of art, science and social-justice museums across the country have been running short- and long-term projects for teenagers for decades. Read more.

How good is your evidence?

By Bernadette Wright and Steven E. Wallis,
Stanford Social Innovation Review

Social purpose organizations need better ways to determine the quality of the evidence they use for making decisions. They need the strongest possible evidence they can find to plan effective action, demonstrate the value of their activities to funders and stakeholders, and influence public policy.

Yet funders, policy makers, and managers face competing definitions of what constitutes quality evidence. And while using evidence of any kind to make decisions is better than using no evidence, existing definitions may cause leaders to overlook valuable information that would improve their chances of making truly effective decisions.

Many in the field are calling for higher standards for evidence, or "stronger evidence." Read more.

Eleven nonprofits that make a difference (we think)

By Marc Gunther, Nonprofit Chronicles

We don't have comprehensive ratings or rankings of the best nonprofits, and we probably never will. You can't compare Harvard to Carnegie Hall to the DC Central Kitchen in a meaningful way.

But, by using evidence, it is possible to identify nonprofits that have a positive impact at a reasonable cost. That's what the Center for High Impact Philanthropy (CHIP) at the University of Pennsylvania does in its annual High Impact Giving Guide.

Now in its sixth edition, this is the single most useful guide to smart giving that I've come across since I began writing about philanthropy nearly two years ago. Read more.

Collaborative research on competitive giving

By Cali Curley, assistant professor, IU School of Public and Environmental Affairs at IUPUI

Every March since 2012, Brackets For Good, an Indianapolis-based 501(c)(3) charitable organization, hosts online "competitive giving" fundraising tournaments. With March Madness as the impetus, there are now nonprofits in 10 additional cities involved, and a national competition.

Participating nonprofits rally enthusiastic donors to out-fundraise their opponents in order to advance into the next round of the tournament. By generating stakeholder excitement, promoting the tournament, and soliciting corporate involvement, nonprofits earn increased exposure, raise funds, gain access to free fundraising tools and are introduced to new donors.
