The line between nonprofit and for-profit increasingly blurry

By Marya Besharov, Associate Professor of Organizational Behavior, Cornell University

As we are reminded by the release of Bernie's Yearning, the flavor from Ben & Jerry's co-founder Ben Cohen, the boundaries between profits and purpose are increasingly blurred. While many have debated whether this mixing of profits and purpose is good or bad for business and society, it is time to move on. Organizations and leaders that use businesses to address social issues are here to stay. We should focus, therefore, on how they can do so most effectively.

In the for-profit sector, corporations increasingly engage in corporate social responsibility, while on the nonprofit side, traditional charities face growing pressure to demonstrate a measurable return to donors who are no longer satisfied with inspiring stories about changed lives or communities revitalized.

But perhaps the trend that most epitomizes the blurring of profits and purpose is the rise of hybrid social enterprises whose raison d'être is to pursue a social mission through a commercial venture. Think Toms Shoes, think Warby Parker, and even King Arthur Flour. From 2006 to 2011, the number of social entrepreneurs pursuing hybrid ventures as opposed to purely for-profit or purely nonprofit ventures increased from 37 percent to almost 50 percent. Beware blurring of sectors

By Eric Nee, managing editor, Stanford Social Innovation Review

From the beginning, Stanford Social Innovation Review has been a strong proponent of the idea that the nonprofit sector had much to learn from the for-profit sector and vice versa. In fact, one of the feature articles in this issue, "The Promise of Lean Experimentation," does just that. Consultants Peter Murray and Steve Ma write about how the "lean model"-an increasingly popular approach to building a business, especially in Silicon Valley-can be adapted for the nonprofit sector. Much like design thinking, which was also adapted from the for-profit sector, the lean model provides new ways for nonprofit organizations to launch, test, and implement new programs and services more efficiently and effectively.

The lines between the nonprofit and for-profit sectors that were once sharp are indeed blurring. The difference between a for-profit Benefit Corporation and a nonprofit social enterprise, for example, is sometimes hard to distinguish. Both sell products and services to customers. Both are driven by a social mission. And both make decisions only after

Time for the plural sector

By Henry Mintzberg, Cleghorn Professor of Management Studies, McGill University

What is frequently called the "third sector" turns out to be surprisingly obscure. No wonder, with vague labels like this one. What does third sector mean to most people? This sector deserves a better name, and it deserves greater recognition of the critical role it will have to play in restoring balance in this troubled world.

What might best be called the "plural sector" (more later on why) has been consistently excluded from the great debates of our time -- over left versus right, public sector governments versus private sector markets, nationalization versus privatization (as if these two sectors are the only homes for our important institutions). People argue about the need for government control of health care services to insure equality, compared with leaving control to the marketplace for the sake of efficiency, without recognizing how many of these services are actually supplied by community institutions in the plural sector for the sake of quality. And then we use the term PPP as if partnerships exist only between organizations that are public and private.

considering their impact on all stakeholders and society. The main difference between the two, it seems, is their ownership structure.

Tablet or laptop: What drives the decision?

By Chip Heberden, owner and president, Netlink, Inc.

Unless your organization supports the increasing trend toward BYOD (Bring Your Own Device), the laptop or tablet battle may still be unresolved.

Decision-makers, especially in smaller organizations, are continually tasked with making sense of these devices, navigating the hype, and ultimately finding the right fit for their staffs. Sometimes there is an IT partner to assist, other times it can be a solo effort with everyone having an opinion.

To help navigate this murky, ambiguous topic, here are some musings on the subject. Increasingly, the first question seems to be: Is a laptop even necessary when tablets can perform so many of the same functions?

The short answer is — it depends. Apple's iOS, Android and Microsoft all offer different ideas on what a tablet is. Generally, it is a device designed to work from an application framework always connected to the Web. Every person uses his or her technology differently. Some can easily get by with a tablet working only from the Web. For others, additional capabilities are needed. Read more.

Announcements

Important filing changes for Indiana nonprofit corporations. Significant changes are being implemented to the reporting requirements for Indiana nonprofit corporations over the next several months. Beginning July 1, the Business Entity Report filings will be made on a biennial cycle, and nonprofit corporations will file a Business Entity Report every other year with the filing fee increasing from $10 to $20. Because the biennial reporting cycle is being implemented mid-year, the reporting requirements vary depending on when a nonprofit corporation was incorporated. Read the full article here.
