An army of data joined the war on poverty

By Andrew Keatts, Kinder Institute for Urban Research for The HuffPost Impact

For all the resources and attention paid to combating poverty, the whole endeavor suffers from relatively limited data.

A new measure that debuted this fall aims to correct that problem.

Researchers at Indiana University's Lilly Family School of Philanthropy partnered with Salvation Army to develop the Human Needs Index, a real-time measure of poverty that they hope will better inform both policy makers and service providers of the true on-the-ground needs of poor Americans. Detroit PAL breaks ground youth complex at Old Tiger stadium

By Adrienne Roberts, reporter, Detroit Business Daily News

Should older CEOs be forced to retire?

By Walter Frick, senior associate editor, Harvard Business Review

The Detroit Police Athletic League announced it raised $12 million and will be able to break ground in April on its new youth sports complex and headquarters at the site of the old Tiger Stadium in Detroit's Corktown neighborhood.

"For many years, the corner of Michigan and Trumbull and Tiger Stadium was where many young athletes began incredible careers enabling them to give back to their communities," says Detroit Mayor Mike Duggan. "It's meaningful that this site will honor many of those individuals while becoming the newest complex for more Detroit kids to receive the kind of mentoring and support through sports programming that Detroit PAL provides." In October 2000, Jack Welch announced the biggest deal of his 20-year tenure as head of GE: a $45 billion merger with Honeywell.

Shortly thereafter he was forced to retire, due to GE's mandatory retirement policy for CEOs turning 65.

More than a third of S&P 500 firms have a mandatory retirement policy for their CEO. Their aim is to drive out executives who are past their prime. But are such policies a good idea?

Yes, but with some caveats. Read more.

Multi-tasking myths and reality

By Chip Heberden, president and owner, Netlink, Inc.

The turmoil of a typical workday creates endless opportunities and constant pressure to do many things concurrently. Our technology lets us conference call during our commute, email during meetings, and channel the great football commentator John Madden by handling a continuous stream of inbound pings as we work through workday requests from co-workers, customers, clients or our social network.

Multitasking is the universally accepted vernacular we use to reassure ourselves that our technology is allowing us to do more, keep up and get better all the time. Whether it's the constant pull of texting, tending to the requirements emails, which would be better suited to a phone call), your mind has many opportunities to get sidetracked with the fix of the moment.

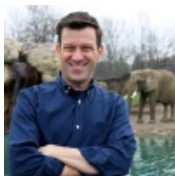

Growing up with technology, this situation seems natural: why not attend a meeting and catch up on your email at the same time. Or document your lunch with via Instagram for your personal network while out to eat with co-workers. Multitasking means you are getting it "ALL" done at once, doesn't it?

But are we getting it done? Read more.
