Gender pay gap hurts women in retirement

By Mark Miller, Reuters reporter, Minneapolis Star Tribune

Women who work full-time, year-round, made just 79 cents for every dollar paid to their male counterparts in 2014, U.S. Census Bureau data show.

But the injustice of the gender pay gap also impacts retirement security.

A woman who works full-time over a 40-year period loses $435,480 in lifetime income

(today's dollars) due to the wage gap, according to the National Women's Law Center, a nonprofit legal and advocacy group.

The income gap translates directly to lower income from Social Security and pensions -- since those benefits are determined by wage history -- and it hampers the capacity of women to save for retirement.

And since women typically live longer than men, savings often must be stretched across more years of retirement.

Paying women less than men for the same work has been illegal since 1963. Seven years ago, President Obama signed the Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act, which makes it easier for workers to challenge pay inequality. He announced last month that employers with more than 100 workers will be required to start reporting compensation data by gender to the federal government. Read more.

Mindfully managing millennials

By Jeremy York, HR field representative, Synergy

As an HR professional, managers often ask for advice on how to best manage their millennial staff. Many of them express frustration that the traditional management methods used in the past are no longer effective.

Why? It's because millennials are unlike any other generation currently in the workforce. They work differently, think differently, and have different expectations from employees we have managed for years.

First of all, who are millennials? Millennials were born from 1981-2000 and are often referred to as "Generation Next." They are fiercely independent and value achievement, diversity, work/life balance and open communication. Millennials grew up with technology at their fingertips, had a best friend named Google, and received recognition not just for winning, but for participating. Read more.
