Can an algorithm tell when kids are in danger?

By Dan Hurley, contributor, The New York Times Magazine

The call to Pittsburgh's hotline for child abuse and neglect came in at 3:50 p.m. on the Wednesday after Thanksgiving 2016. Sitting in one of 12 cubicles, in a former factory now occupied by the Allegheny County Police Department and the back offices of the department of Children, Youth and Families, the call screener, Timothy Byrne, listened as a preschool teacher described what a 3-year-old child had told him. The little girl had said that a man, a friend of her mother's, had been in her home when he "hurt their head and was bleeding and shaking on the floor and the bathtub." The teacher said he had seen on the news that the mother's boyfriend had overdosed and died in the home.

According to the case records, Byrne searched the department's computer database for the family, finding allegations dating back to 2008: parental substance abuse, inadequate hygiene, domestic violence, inadequate provision of food and physical care, medical neglect and sexual abuse by an uncle involving one of the girl's two older siblings. But none of those allegations had been substantiated. And while the current claim, of a man dying of an overdose in the child's home, was shocking, it fell short of the minimal legal requirement for sending out a caseworker to knock on the family's door and open an investigation.

Before closing the file, Byrne had to estimate the risk to the child's future well-being. Screeners like him hear far more alarming stories of children in peril nearly every day. He keyed into the computer: "Low risk." In the box where he had to select the likely threat to the children's immediate safety, he chose "No safety threat." Read more.

Nonprofits give 'disconnected' youths another chance

By Alina Tugend, reporter, The New York Times

Jonathan's father always told him he would never amount to anything other than a drug dealer. He entered the foster care system when he was 12. At 18, he was in college, but had to drop out to take care of his ill grandmother.

"I always told myself I would graduate college and wouldn't be a statistic in the foster care system," said Jonathan, 26, who gave only his first name to protect his privacy. But at 21, he was homeless and jobless. "One day I Googled 'help with foster kids aging out,'" Jonathan said, and he found Youth Villages, one of the national nonprofits aimed at stopping the downward spiral of people like him. He now lives in an off-campus apartment at Bridgewater State University in Massachusetts, drives part time for Uber to help support himself and just graduated with a bachelor's degree in management with a concentration in operations. In California a helping push for foster youth get financial aid

By Sunshine Decosta, intern, The Chronicle of Social Change

San Francisco-based John Burton Advocates for Youth is launching an initiative across California to help link more foster youth with financial aid resources in college.

The goal of the year-long "California Foster Youth FAFSA Challenge" that begins this month is to make sure that foster youth in high schools across the state fill out financial aid forms for higher education, including the Free Application for Federal Student Aid (FAFSA).

John Burton Advocates for Youth is rolling out the statewide campaign along with the California Department of Education, the California Community College Chancellor's Office and County Offices of Education, which run Foster Youth Services Coordinating Programs in counties across the state. Tax Cuts and Jobs Act: key provisions affecting nonprofits

By Rob Brinkers, CPA and tax manager, Alerding CPA Group

After many months of deliberation, on Dec. 20, Congress completed passage of the largest federal tax reform law in more than 30 years. Commonly called the "Tax Cuts and Jobs Act" (TCJA), the new law means substantial changes for nonprofit organizations.

Despite the bill's nearly 1100 pages, below is a brief overview of some of the most significant provisions impacting nonprofits. Except where noted, these changes are effective for tax years beginning after Dec. 31, 2017 and before Jan. 1, 2026.

Changes that DID pass:

- Excise tax of 21 percent will be imposed on wages in excess of $1 million for any covered employee of a nonprofit entity, which includes any former or current employee of a tax exempt organization who is one of the five most highly compensated employees for the taxable year.
- Excise tax of 1.4 percent will be imposed on net investment income of some colleges and universities. This tax will apply to institutions with at least 500 students whose investment accounts have a fair market value of $500,000 or more per student and will impact large endowment account balances.
