

To reach new audiences, museums are redefining what they offer

By Alina Tugend, columnist, The New York Times

As guests walk into the lobby of the Indianapolis Museum of Art they are greeted by a seven-and-a-half-foot blue plastic snail, often surrounded by a group of squealing, joyful children daring to touch it.

It might not be what most people expect from one of the oldest museums in the country. But along with summer mini-golf events (holes designed by local and regional artists), a Winterlights display and a beer garden, this Midwestern institution is changing everything from its name - now branded as Newfields for the museum and related sites -- to its mission and its admission price.

The new identity is part of a trend throughout the arts world in which museums are taking revolutionary steps -- some cheered, some not -- to attract new audiences and stabilize their revenues.

"I think this is the direction many museums are headed in, including our own," said Lori Fogarty, director of the Oakland Museum of California and president of the Association of Art Museum Directors. Most museums are grappling with attracting a wider and more diverse audience, she said, and the Indianapolis Museum of Art "has done it in a very, very interesting way." Read more.

A neuroscientist helps the Peabody Essex Museum get inside your head

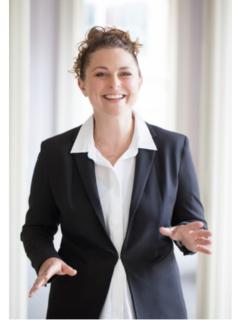

By Heather Kapplow, Hyperallergic

The Peabody Essex Museum (PEM) in Salem, Mass. has been looking in some very non-traditional places for solutions to the problem that many art museums have grappled with over the past ten years or so: declining attendance. The problem has most typically been attributed to a greying of museum membership, and been addressed by creating events aimed at bringing in new audiences. Museums now turn to beefing up marketing, education, and community engagement efforts, often with the intention of making demographic shifts in audience makeup.

And perhaps this turn is working among certain institutions. The Association of Art Museum Directors' 2016 data (covering 212 of its member art museums in North America) reports that though membership has gone down, their total attendance has been on a steady rise since 2014 -- increasing by over three quarters of a million visitors between 2015 and 2017.

But PEM is looking a little more inward in its efforts to build its audience -- at its own exhibition design practices, and then, even further inward, at human cognition.

In early 2017, with funding from Boston's Barr

Foundation, they posted an ad seeking a "neuroscience researcher" to support a "neuroscience advisory board" with the goal of integrating "cutting edge neuroscience" into "art and exhibition design." Read more.

Giving to religion: a leader in charitable giving

By Juli Knutson, senior writing associate, Johnson, Grossnickle & Associates

Since 1957, Giving USA has published the longest-running, most comprehensive analysis of charitable contributions, and religion continually tops the list over the other nonprofit subsectors by a wide margin.

The Giving USA: Special Report on Giving to Religion (Fall 2017) sheds new light on giving to this sector, including the unique challenge of calculating these estimates and how the evolving religious landscape is changing charitable giving in America overall.

At an estimated $122.94 billion given in 2016, religion cornered the market at 32 percent of total giving, which is more than twice the next closest contender, education. But a closer look at the data behind the giving reveals some relevant facts that can inform giving more broadly across all sectors. Generally, religious donors give at higher rates to other subsectors than their non-religious peers, according to Connected to Give: Faith Communities. Read more.
