Getting more than you pay for with pay-for-success

By Greta Hansen, Santa Clara chief assistant county counsel, Stanford Social Innovation Review

California's Santa Clara County, which includes the majority of Silicon Valley, is home to many of the largest and most successful tech companies in the world. It is also home to one of the largest homeless populations in the country. On any given night, more than 6,500 county residents are homeless. More than 2,200 have been homeless for several years and often suffer from serious mental illness, chronic physical health issues, or other disabling conditions.

Santa Clara asked if it could effectively identify and house these high-need, high-cost individuals, could it both substantially improve their quality of life and more effectively and efficiently use taxpayer dollars. This observation is what led the county last year to launch Project Welcome Home, an initiative designed to provide community-based clinical services and permanent supportive housing for 150 to 200 chronically homeless individuals who are among the most frequent users of the county's emergency rooms, acute mental health facilities and jail system. To ensure both successful results and accountable spending of public dollars, the county is using a "pay-for-success" approach to contracting these services over a six-year period. Read more.

Homeless resources in Indianapolis

This week, Indianapolis Star reporter, Maureen Gilmer, wrote a story about seeking help for a homeless mom. The story referenced the Street Outreach Rapid Response Team, and other nonprofits that acted immediately to secure a spot for this family. To learn more about Indianapolis' services, read her article.

Just like that, within three hours, a desperate young mom and her kids were rescued from an uncertain future. I was astounded at how quickly this family got the help they desperately needed, but at the same time, I know there are others who aren't as lucky as Brown and her family.

These kinds of street rescues are what Street Outreach Rapid Response Team and Professional Blended Street Outreach are built to do. The rapid response team is actually a network of 67 people representing 22 organizations in the city - shelters, hospitals, mental health agencies, veterans' groups, even animal welfare advocates.

"We've identified gaps in services available on the streets for people, and we've brought those folks together to help those most vulnerable," said team coordinator Melissa Burgess.

When an email goes out to the group, "everybody jumps up and is ready to help if they're able to," she said.

New approaches to ending homelessness in Seattle

By Lena Blake, contributor, Rethinking Prosperity

The city of Seattle has taken laudable steps to address the issue of poverty. In 2014, Seattle approved a minimum $15 wage, as well as a budget package of $4.8 billion that allocated close to $1 million to services for the homeless. One of the most praiseworthy elements to this is that it produced funds for transitional encampments.

Despite the much-needed attention, homelessness is worse than ever in Seattle. While a long-term solution is being worked on, Al Jazeera reports Seattle mayor defends plan to open tent cities to curb rising homelessness. Concerns of marginalization and discrimination are mounting among the homeless that restrictions to this plan will literally push them further to the outskirts of society.

With a growing problem, advocates suggest Seattle look at different approaches with a successful track record. Read more.

Use people strategy as your competitive advantage

By Mike Bensi, advisor, FirstPerson

I was flipping through some old school papers I've hung on to for far too long and found my notes from Michael Porter's book, Competitive Advantage. If you haven't heard of Michael Porter, here's a great summary of him and the business ideas and strategies he's shared over the years.

In this particular book, Porter said companies win over their competitors by being cheaper or by being different -- being perceived by the customer as better or more relevant. There are no other ways.

While Porter was speaking to competition within business, we can apply this to the competition for talent we're experiencing today. Companies have two ways to gain an advantage over other companies looking for the same talent: pay the most or be so different from other companies it's easy to draw in and keep top talent.

Playing the numbers game is not sustainable, and applicants don't rank this in the top criteria when looking for jobs. Companies must reflect on how their people strategy is better and different than other companies. To accomplish this, think like Porter and create a "value chain" within your employee lifecycle. This value chain should focus on five stages of your employee lifecycle as a series of activities which link together. With it, you'll be better able to show talent how you stand out from the rest.
