Pulliam Trust hones its environmental giving

By Lynn Sygiel, editor, Charitable Advisors

It's no secret that Nina Mason Pulliam was passionate about animals and nature. As a community leader, and a newspaper publisher in Arizona and Indiana, she supported those causes, and others, in multiple ways.

Now, nearly 20 years after her death with the establishment of a 50-year-limited legacy Trust that bears her name, those two passions are still championed. What has changed recently are the defined priorities for environmental giving.

When Harriet Ivey, the Trust's first leader, retired three years ago, Gene D'Adamo was hired to continue its legacy. Ivey had been at the helm as president and CEO during the Trust's first 15 years, and laid a strong foundation.

"As with any foundation, as it gains experience and community knowledge, its focus narrows," said D'Adamo. "We could only do what we're doing now, because of what Harriet had laid. She took an organization from nothing, and established the Trust." Read more.

Wellness on the White River

More than 5 miles of wilderness trails and 210 acres of wildlife habitat hide along the White River waterway in downtown Indianapolis, but remain largely underused by nearby neighborhoods. With improvements to the New York Street Bridge, Reconnecting to Our Waterways aims to boost well-being by connecting Near Westside residents to zones of physical activity and active play.

Most Indianapolis residents would be surprised to learn that a quarter marathon-length waterfront trail exists in the heart of downtown. Red-tailed hawks, deer, beaver, osprey, and great-horned owls all call the Urban Wilderness Trail along the White River home. The trails offer a peaceful break from city life, but also a breathtaking backdrop to stay physically active. Paved bike trails above run parallel to crushed limestone and grass trails below by the river-offering recreation options to cyclists, walkers, runners, with soft surfaces amenable to those with knee problems and limited mobility. Arizona Republic environmental reporting

Arizona is a grand place to live and play. But it takes work to keep it that way, to protect the canyons, the rivers, the mountains, the wildlife, the wide desert skies. That's why we're here to help you learn more about Arizona's land, air and water, the natural resources we all care about.

With support from the Nina Mason Pulliam Charitable Trust, the environmental reporting team at The Arizona Republic and azcentral.com will examine the issues critical to Arizona's future and look for solutions to problems we find, for what we need to keep Arizona grand.

The team includes nationally recognized environmental journalist Brandon Loomis, who has explored the farthest reaches of Arizona and the West to find the best stories; editor Shaun McKinnon, who has logged thousands of miles of his own as a reporter covering water and environment; and azcentral's award-winning photo staff. The overlooked benefits of outsourcing nonprofit accounting

By Jim Simpson, CPA and director, Financial Technologies & Management

In the nonprofit community, outsourcing typically means long-term delegation of key operation to outside experts. The accompanying expectation is improvement of the quality, strengthening effectiveness, and lowering or controlling costs.

A key difference in the nonprofit sector is not only controlling costs, but becoming a more effective organization. Finance and accounting departments are two essential back-office areas in nonprofit organizations.

With limited resources, a nonprofit can outsource some or all its financial functions, which can help a nonprofit efficiently staff and conduct its financial operations. It also respects the board and executives limited time or expertise to manage the finance functions, and allow more allocation of resources toward mission and program outcomes.

Here are six overlooked, and sometimes unknown, benefits of outsourcing nonprofit accounting. Read more.
