Bringing together research and action

By Stephanie Wykstra, freelancer, Stanford Social Innovation Review

Late in the evening in 2016, after what felt like the "worst party" he'd ever attended, Will Adler considered his future. He was halfway through a PhD in neuroscience at New York University, but he felt a tension between his academic interests and his desire to do something more immediately useful. So he invited fellow students and professors in NYU's neuroscience and psychology departments to a meeting, and they began considering how they could direct their skills to improving public policy.

By late fall, they had formed Scientist Action and Advocacy Network (ScaAN) with the goal of partnering with nonprofit organizations that could use their help. They soon got in touch with Raise the Age, a campaign advocating for New York to increase the age of criminal responsibility to 18. (New York was one of only two states that automatically prosecuted 16- and 17-year-olds as adults).

Neuroscience PhD student Jenn Laura Lee led ScaAN's effort to present research on the malleability of the adolescent brain to lawmakers. This was an important contribution to conveying the matter in a way that non-neuroscientists could understand, say Raise the Age advocates Beth Powers and Stephanie Gendell. In April, Governor Andrew Cuomo signed "raise the age" policy into law. Read more.

Citizen-sourced data toolkit shows communities how to get more accurate numbers

By Colin Wood, managing editor, StateScoop

Cities can miss out on millions in federal funding if census-takers don't know where to find all of a neighborhood's residents. A new toolkit from a civic-engagement nonprofit promises to show communities how to get more accurate data so that doesn't happen.

Published in January by Cities of Service -- a bipartisan coalition of cities formed in 2009 by billionaire Michael Bloomberg with the goal of encouraging citizen participating in local government -- the new toolkit includes a guide to recruiting and organizing citizen volunteers, as well as deploying digital tools that aid the process of more accurate data collection.

A top goal of the program is to ensure that cities maintain up-to-date master address files. Those databases serve as the foundation for the census. Read more.

Young people as change agents: the Obama Foundation's approach to civic engagement

By David Simas, CEO of the Obama Foundation

There is no playbook for what works when it comes to civic engagement. Some young people have a desire to make a difference -- they want to make their world a better place, but aren't sure where to begin. And some don't see themselves as change agents or active citizens. The public square is too noisy or uncivil, or they don't understand the power and value of their voice.

Our goal at the Obama Foundation is to make active citizenship accessible to anyone, anywhere. President Barack Obama asked me to lead the Obama Foundation because we both recognize that civic engagement -- the ability to connect and work with people all around the world regardless of our backgrounds -- represents our best hope at solving some of the biggest challenges we face. FIRST PERSON

Handling misinformation in the workplace

By Logan Schwering, sales and advisor team, FirstPerson

Imagine you're in an important meeting at work and a colleague makes a comment that isn't entirely true. This could be a false representation of sales numbers, organizational changes, or month-end revenue growth. The person isn't lying to cover up something, and although they genuinely believe they are correct, they aren't. How do you handle this as a professional? What is your response?

More relevant now with the increased use of social media, there are abundant opportunities for false information to spread. It can happen anywhere, especially outside of the conference room.

So now, more than ever, there is a need to ensure correct information is provided to people before being shared more broadly or outside the company.

There's often a strong temptation to correct someone when we know a piece of information is incorrect; however, correction can be humiliating for the person, especially when it involves a superior. It may not add value to the overall conversation or outcome, so is it really worth it?
